Sustainable Professionalism

TREVOR C.W. FARROW *

This article challenges traditional visions of lawyering by building on current alternative narratives and articulating a new discourse of professionalism that is personally, politically, ethically, economically, and professionally sustainable. It is a discourse that makes space for lawyers’ principles, interests, and life preferences by balancing them with other important interests (including, but not dominated by, those of clients). It is a discourse that seeks to make good on aspirational promises of equality, access to justice, and protecting the public interest. And it is a discourse that takes seriously obligations to, as well as benefits from, the culturally complicated makeup of the bar and pluralistic and globalized civil societies.

Cet article défie les perceptions traditionnelles de l’exercice du droit, en mettant à profit les représentations alternatives actuelles, et en formulant un nouveau discours de professionnalisme viable du point de vue personnel, politique, éthique, économique et professionnel. Il s’agit d’un discours qui tient compte des principes, intérêts et préférences de vie des avocats, en les équilibrant avec les autres intérêts importants (y compris, mais sans qu’ils dominent, les intérêts des clients). Il s’agit d’un discours qui cherche à tenir les promesses aspirant à l’égalité, à l’accès à la justice et à la protection des intérêts publics. Et il s’agit d’un discours qui prend au sérieux les obligations—ainsi que les avantages qui en découlent—de la composition culturellement compliquée du barreau, ainsi que des sociétés civiles pluralistes et mondialisées.

* Associate Professor, Osgoode Hall Law School, York University. Parts of this article were first presented at two University of Toronto, Faculty of Law “Bridge Week” panels on legal ethics and professionalism entitled “Conceptual Frameworks for Legal Ethics” (8 November 2006 and 7 November 2007), one chaired by the Honourable Mr. Justice Stephen Goudge and the other by Lorne Sossin. I am grateful to my co-panelists—Randal Graham and Paul Paton—together with Stephen Goudge, Lorne Sossin, and Michael Code for helpful comments at those panels. This article has also benefitted from numerous discussions with Adam Dodek, Janet Mosher, Robert Wai, Rusby Chaparro, Graham Hudson, Stuart O’Connell, and Mary Stokes in the context of creating Osgoode Hall Law School’s new “Ethical Lawyering in a Global Community” course, for which I am the course director. I am grateful to Allan Hutchinson, Jamie Cameron, Adam Dodek, Alice Woolley, the Osgoode Hall Law Journal student editorial board, and an anonymous reviewer for very helpful comments and suggestions on an early draft of this article. Finally, I am also grateful to Alan Melamud for excellent research assistance.
Men make their own history, but they do not make it just as they please; they do not make it under circumstances chosen by themselves, but under circumstances directly found, given and transmitted from the past. The tradition of all the dead generations weighs like a nightmare on the brain of the living. And just when they seem engaged in revolutionizing themselves and things, in creating something entirely new, precisely in such epochs of revolutionary crisis they anxiously conjure up the spirits of the past to their service and borrow from them names, battle slogans and costumes in order to present the new scene of world history in this time-honoured disguise and this borrowed language.

If lawyers cannot look at the society as a whole and say that certain aspects of their work ... represent a plus for this society and for the world of our children, then they had better look to last-ditch defenses. Better yet, lawyers should try to find a way to salvage what is worth doing out of their work and be influential in the production of what is going to happen next.\textsuperscript{2}

---

THE TRADITIONAL NARRATIVE of the legal profession has run its course. Lawyers are looking for ethically sensitive ways to practice law that “assume greater responsibility for the welfare of parties other than clients”\textsuperscript{3} and that increasingly amount “to a plus for this society and for the world of our children.”\textsuperscript{4} Lawyers are also seeking ways to practice law that allow them to get home at night and on weekends, see their families, work full or part-time, practice in diverse and “alternative” settings, and generally pursue a meaningful career in the law rather than necessarily a total life in the law.\textsuperscript{5} Similarly, law students are hoping not to be asked to make a “pact with the Devil”\textsuperscript{6} as the cost of becoming a lawyer, and are instead looking to find areas in the law that fit with their personal, political, and economic preferences.\textsuperscript{7} An increasing number of legal academics are teaching, researching, and writing about progressive changes to the way we view the role and purpose of lawyering.\textsuperscript{8}

8. See e.g. Allan C. Hutchinson, Legal Ethics and Professional Responsibility, 2d ed. (Toronto: Irwin, 2006) [Hutchinson, Legal Ethics]; Rhode, “Persistent Questions,” supra note 3 at 643. For a very useful discussion on trends in Canadian academic scholarship in the area of legal ethics and professionalism, see Adam M. Dodek, “Canadian Legal Ethics: Ready for the Twenty-First Century at Last” (2008) 46 Osgoode Hall L.J. 1 [Dodek, “Canadian are actively reforming their programs and creating centres and initiatives designed to make space for innovative ethics offerings and public interest programs. Law societies and other regulatory bodies are slowly chipping away at some of the time-honoured shields of ethically suspect client behaviour, while at the same time facing demands for increased accountability. The bench and the bar are taking an active interest in addressing a perceived growing lack of professionalism within the practice. The public is increasingly skeptical of the distinction that continues to be drawn between legal ethics and "ordinary standards of moral conduct." Finally, clients are not only expecting lawyers to actively canvass methods of alternative dispute resolution—the alternative to the adversarial and Legal Ethics]. Further, there is a newly formed Canadian network of ethics scholars (of which I am a member) that is supported by the law school deans and that is currently seeking to create a Canadian Virtual Center for Legal Ethics and Professional Responsibility. See also Part III.B.

9. See e.g. Osgoode Hall Law School, “Ethical Lawyering in a Global Community” course, online: <http://osgoode.yorku.ca/QuickPlace/trevorfarrow/PageLibrary/85273410062FAF0.msfh_Toc/92be13faec1b58390525670800167238/?OpenDocument> [“Ethical Lawyering”]; Osgoode Public Interest Requirement Program, “First Year Degree Requirements,” online: <http://www.osgoode.yorku.ca/lb/lb1/first_year_requirements.html>. See also Harvard Law School, “Program on the Legal Profession,” online: <http://www.law.harvard.edu/programs/plp/>; University of Toronto, Faculty of Law, “Centre for Professionalism, Ethics and Public Service,” online: <http://www.law.utoronto.ca/faculty_content.asp?itemPath=1/9/12/0/0&contentId=1602&cType=webpages>.

11. See e.g. Rhode, “Persistent Questions,” supra note 3 at 657-58.

12. See e.g. Chief Justice of Ontario’s Advisory Committee on Professionalism, online: <http://www.lsoc.on.ca/latest-news/a/hottopics/committe-on-professionalism/>. Massachusetts, supra note 9 at 820-21. See also Paul D. Paton, “The Independence of the Bar and the Public Interest Imperative: Lawyers as Gatekeepers, Whistleblowers, or Instruments of State Enforcement?” in LSUC, In the Public Interest (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2007) 175.

costly litigation process—but they are also demanding evidence of general sustainable professional practices from their legal counsel.14

These current, contextual, and contested realities have become badges of modern progressive lives in the practice of law, as well as its visions. Taken together, they are forming a new discourse for lawyers and the legal profession that is seeking to become personally, politically, ethically, economically, and professionally sustainable. It is a discourse that makes meaningful space for a lawyer’s own principles, interests, and life preferences by balancing them with other important interests—including, but not dominated by, those of the client—in the context of the overall calculus of what counts as the “right” course of conduct both in a given retainer as well as, more generally, in a given career.15 It is a discourse that seeks to make good on what has largely only amounted to aspirational promises of equality, access to justice, and the protection of the public interest. And it is a discourse that seeks both to benefit from and take seriously its obligations to address the culturally complicated makeup of the bar and our general pluralistic and globalized civil societies. This modern discourse of an ethically sustainable profession challenges the “time-honoured”16 centrality of client autonomy and a lawyer’s unqualified loyalty to the client’s interests. Specifically, it rejects stories of lawyers, collectively, as members of a relatively homogenized profession and who, individually, are single-tasked “hired guns” focused on only one interest “in all the world.”17 According to this new model, those stories are no longer—if they ever were—sustainable.

17. See Trial of Queen Caroline, infra note 68. See generally, below, Part II.
Thinking about the profession in terms of a discourse of “professional sustainability” that takes seriously a broad range of voices and interests is surprisingly new. The label “sustainable” has not, to date, been generally applied to discussions of ethics and professionalism in the legal context.\(^{18}\) And because as a profession, lawyers are still “anxiously” fearful of replacing the “spirits” of “dead generations,” which continue to weigh on us “like a nightmare”\(^{19}\) (lawyers grow up and depend on stories of zeal, vigour, and role-differentiated behaviour\(^{20}\) that allow them to act for all kinds of clients, including those who they think are “reprehensible,”\(^{21}\) while still being able to sleep soundly at night), a discourse of sustainable professionalism is threatening. Proponents of the dominant model borrow “names, battle slogans, and costumes”:\(^{22}\) names such as “zealous advocates,”\(^{23}\) “shock troops,”\(^{24}\) “hired gun[s],”\(^{25}\) and “soldiers of the law”;\(^{26}\) battle slogans such as “fierce,” “fearless,” “resolute,” and “partisan”;\(^{27}\) and costumes such as barristers’ gowns, tabs, and waistcoats. They doggedly and dogmatically\(^{28}\) re-make a history under this

---

18. See further note 196 and surrounding text.
20. For a discussion of role-differentiated behaviour (a behavioural approach that “often makes it both appropriate and desirable for the person in a particular role to put to one side considerations of various sorts—and especially various moral considerations—that would otherwise be relevant if not decisive”), see Richard Wasserstrom, “Lawyers as Professionals: Some Moral Issues” (1975) 5 Hum. Rts. 1 at 3 [Wasserstrom, “Lawyers as Professionals”].
21. From Gary Mason, “‘A rigorous defence … is the key to our system’” The Globe and Mail (11 December 2007) A15 [Mason].
22. See Marx, “Eighteenth Brumaire,” supra note 1 at 595.
24. Matasar, ibid. at 975.
26. Matasar, supra note 23 at 985.
27. See e.g. R. v. Felderhof, supra note 23 at para. 85; LSUC, Rules, supra note 10 at r. 4.01(1) and commentary; and Canadian Bar Association, Code of Professional Conduct (adopted August 2004 and February 2006), c. IX [CBA, Code].
28. For a useful treatment of the deployment of dogmatic language in the service of sustaining
“time-honoured disguise and this borrowed language”\textsuperscript{29} in a continued effort to “create[,] a world after [their] image.”\textsuperscript{30}

The resulting paradox created by the dominant narrative is that, although the stories that continue to be told are becoming less attractive to more people,\textsuperscript{31} the stories continue to be told. To my mind, given the complex realities of the current professional trajectory,\textsuperscript{32} lawyers need another story—a sustainable story—that captures those complex realities and provides for a meaningful prospect of broad-based buy-in. Alternative models that critique the dominant model provide another story.\textsuperscript{33} Those critiques, which are becoming increasingly attractive, are often framed in terms of the “moral perspective,”\textsuperscript{34} “moral lawyering,”\textsuperscript{35} “the moral lawyer,”\textsuperscript{36} or “the good lawyer.”\textsuperscript{37} These labels appear to connote some shared or required understanding of what counts as “moral” or “good,” whereas the safe harbours of zealous advocacy and neutral partisanship\textsuperscript{38} provide sheltered, role-differentiated moral refuge, and continue to be preferred over alternative accounts. Further, these alternative models are typically criticized for

\begin{itemize}
\item legal traditions—specifically in the context of solicitor-client privilege—see Adam M. Dodek, “Theoretical Foundations of Solicitor-Client Privilege” [unpublished].
\item See Marx, “Eighteenth Brumaire,” \textit{supra} note 1 at 595.
\item I realize that, although correct in my view, this statement is not uncontroversial. For example, many clients (and indeed many lawyers) are quite happy with the current model. See Part II.C, below, for more on this topic.
\item See \textit{e.g.} \textit{supra} notes 3-14.
\item See Part III, below, for further discussion of these alternatives. See also Jerome E. Bickenbach, “The Redemption of the Moral Mandate of the Profession of Law” (1996) 9 Can. J.L. & Jur. 51.
\item See \textit{e.g.} Matasar, \textit{supra} note 23.
\item See \textit{e.g.} Hon. Frank Iacobucci, “The Practice of Law: Business and Professionalism” (1991) 49 Advocate 859 at 863.
\item See \textit{e.g. infra} note 66 and surrounding text.
\end{itemize}
underplaying the institutional value of the lawyer in the adversarial system, while at the same time overplaying the relevance or supremacy of the lawyer’s individual moral choices or preferences that risk usurping the ethical autonomy of the lawyer’s client.\(^39\)

In my experience, while some students and practitioners\(^40\) are in optimistic agreement with modern critiques, most are, at worst, put off by them and are, at best, intrigued but ultimately not persuaded by their apparent moral superiority, relativity, and sermon-like\(^41\) nature. For example, I recently taught a series of mandatory first year legal ethics seminars.\(^42\) One of the early classes took up the relevance of a lawyer’s sense of self—moral values; social and political views; sense of societal duty, justice, and world outlook; space for personal obligations to family, friends, and other commitments; obligations to work colleagues, institutional preferences, and duties; expectations of equality and progressive workplace experiences; et cetera—in the context of a life in the law, and more specifically, in the context of the lawyer-client advocacy model. I asked the twenty-five students in the seminar to put their hands up if, ideally, they would like to maintain a meaningful sense and space for “self” after becoming lawyers (i.e., whether the profession should be able to accommodate and sustain that sense of self). Approximately twenty-five hands went up. I then asked the same students to put their hands up if they thought creating that space could actually occur “in the real world” of practising lawyers. No hands went up. Of course this informal in-class exercise was neither scientific nor comprehensive. The reaction was, however, consistent with numerous other legal ethics classes in which I have asked the same and similar questions, and with accounts of other student experiences as well.\(^43\) The reaction tells me that,

---

39. See Part II.A-B, below, for more on this topic.
40. My comments here are animated by several experiences: approximately five years as a litigation lawyer at a large firm in Toronto, approximately seven years of teaching ethics and professionalism to LL.B. students in several different institutions in several different jurisdictions, and more recently, teaching also in a part-time graduate program in which most students typically continue to carry on an active law practice.
42. See “Ethical Lawyering,” supra note 9.
43. See e.g. Kennedy, “Rebels from Principle,” supra note 6 at 87 (“I think we should ask of our students that in practice they try to figure out whether there are intelligent, more or less even at the outset of law school, at least some students—and my intuition is that in fact most students—already have a strongly developed sense of allegiance to the institutional history and hegemonic ideology of the practice of law. As such, they are already starting to “think like a lawyer.” Clearly the “spirits of the past” have a firm hold on the “brain[s] of the living.”

This article seeks to demystify the power of those spirits by providing a new way to think about professionalism. Specifically, by tapping into and building upon the ideas and energy of many current alternative models of professionalism, I seek to assist with the project of re-conceiving our modern understanding of professionalism. It is a professionalism that, unlike traditional (dominant) accounts, makes descriptive and normative sense of the complex modern practice of law. In so doing, I do not claim to be making a radical departure from other alternative model thinkers. In fact, what this article does is simply to recalibrate many of the current (primarily alternative) models and discussions through a slightly different lens: that of sustainability.

To frame the overall discussion, Part I provides a brief discussion of the meaning and import of legal ethics and professionalism. Part II reviews some of the relevant history of the traditional model of lawyering that continues to dominate the modern discourse of legal professionalism. Part III canvasses several alternative visions of the profession that critique the dominant model. Part IV, collectively building on a number of those alternative visions, seeks to assist with the development of a sustainable discourse of professionalism.

I. LEGAL ETHICS AND PROFESSIONALISM

This article does not purport to provide a full treatment of the study of ethics generally, or even of legal ethics in particular. A brief understanding of what I mean by ethics and professionalism provides a context for my underlying controlled risks they can take to put their careers behind their opinions. According to my students, they ‘impliedly agreed’ not to do any such thing, and if they tried, they’d be fired, or never make partner”).

44. See e.g. Elkins, supra note 7.

45. See Marx, “Eighteenth Brumaire,” supra note 1 at 595.

46. With apologies to Marx and Engels, it could be said that what I am recognizing is the “spectre” that is currently “haunting” the legal profession: the spectre of sustainable professionalism. See Marx & Engels, “Communist Manifesto,” supra note 30 at 473.
arguments. As a starting point, the concept of ethics invites notions of good and bad as values in themselves, from either the perspective of semantics or of justification. As a starting point, the concept of ethics invites notions of good and bad as values in themselves, from either the perspective of semantics or of justification.47 These perspectives of ethical theory are not immediately interested in the application of ethical thinking to specific contexts of human action.48 G.E. Moore, for example, explained that his approach to the topic of ethics recognizes the distinction between an underlying value itself—namely “the general enquiry into what is good”—and an evaluation of the human action that is derivative from that underlying value.49

For the purposes of this article, my interest in ethics (and in particular legal ethics)—animated in part by Plato’s dialogue on just conduct in the Republic50—is at the level of human action in context. Because this article is concerned with the derivative discussion of ethics as applied to the legal profession, my approach here adopts this derivative standpoint.51 What is “at

47. Although ethicists often think of these perspectives as the subjects more specifically of either meta-ethics or normative ethics, this distinction does not matter for the purposes of this article (a distinction that, in any event, is at least for some “no longer found so convincing or important” (Bernard Williams, Ethics and the Limits of Philosophy (London: Fontana Paperbacks, 1985) 73)). However, for a useful discussion on the basic differences between these sub-streams of ethics, see at c. 5. See also Rhode, Ethics by the Pervasive Method, supra note 6 at 12.

48. That perspective is often thought of as the purview of applied ethics. See e.g. Rhode, ibid. at 12.

51. Although choosing Plato’s more metaphysical treatment of justice as a convenient underlying conceptual starting point, a different lens through which to think about legal ethics could be the lens of pragmatism, developed by thinkers such as William James, John Dewey, and more recently Richard Rorty (see e.g. Richard Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1979)). For example, rather than trying to philosophize about legal ethics and professional responsibility in the context of abstract notions of “the good,” pragmatists would be much more likely to consider the discussion’s practical applications for lawyers and clients (and other interested stakeholders) in the specific context of their everyday roles and experiences. This viewpoint might be helpful when trying to develop an understanding of professionalism—particularly from the contextual perspective of sustainability—that is contemplated in this article. However, because nothing in this article turns on my choice of conceptual lenses, I leave this as a point of departure for future fruitful thinking on ethics and professionalism. For a useful discussion of the distinction between Plato’s general philosophical approach and pragmatism, stake” in this discussion—as Socrates contemplated in his musings with Thrasyamachus about the lives of the just and unjust—is “no light matter.”

Ethics, from this perspective, involves an inquiry into “how one should live one’s life” or “the rule of human life.”

When thinking about the subset of ethics that we call legal ethics, the starting point for the inquiry is to think about how one should live in the context of law, or more specifically, how lawyers ought to act in the context of the profession. To push this discussion further, I turn to Aristotle, who in his discussion on community—and in particular the telos (end) of the community of the polis (city)—argued that the city exists not only “for the sake of living, it exists for the sake of living well.” If we then think of the legal profession as the (self-regulated) community in which we are ultimately contemplating (and judging) the ethics of a lawyer’s action, the legal profession must exist not only for the sake of practising law, but for the sake of practising it well. Any notion of legal ethics must therefore contemplate an understanding of lawyering that is fully engaged with a vision of what amounts to practising well.

We need to find a way of deciding what amounts to “practising well.” Religion, custom, power, and happiness have all been used over the centuries by ethicists to assess the general morality of a given course of action. In the see e.g. Richard Rorty, Consequences of Pragmatism (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1982) at xiii ff. (“Introduction: Pragmatism and Philosophy”). See generally Williams, supra note 47 at 137-38; Charles Taylor, Philosophical Arguments (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1995) at 2 ff. I am grateful to Allan Hutchinson for comments on the application of pragmatism to this project.

---

52. Plato, trans. by Jowett, supra note 50.

specific context of law we might consider the “legality” of a given course of conduct—the client’s conduct—and ask Rob Atkinson’s “fundamental question of professional ethics”: “Should a professional always do all that the law allows, or should the professional recognize other constraints, particularly concerns for the welfare of third parties?” According to Atkinson, this question “divides scholars of legal ethics … into two schools: those who recognize constraints other than law’s outer limit, and those who do not.” The next two parts of this article look at the leading (and competing) approaches to thinking about Atkinson’s “fundamental question.”

Finally, the term “legal ethics” is typically used interchangeably with the term “professionalism” or “professional responsibility.” The sources for what counts as right or wrong for the purposes of these interchangeable approaches to ethics and/or professionalism are found in codes of professional conduct and other legal texts. This interchangeable approach does not typically pose a problem. Often ethics and professionalism map nicely onto one another. For example, it is generally agreed that stealing from a client or acting in a direct financial conflict with a client are bad things, both from the perspective of professional codes and from the perspective of personal morality. However,

57. Atkinson, “Perverted Professionalism,” supra note 41 at 184 [footnotes omitted].
59. A potential objection to using Atkinson’s “fundamental question” to frame this part of the discussion is that often what counts as “legal” is not necessarily something that is neatly separate and apart from lawyers and their ethical deliberation and professional involvement. In fact, lawyers are typically very much bound up in the production of law and its procedural instruments. However, because this is more of an objection to the premise of Atkinson’s question than an objection to my use of his question (which, ultimately—as is developed further in this article in Part IV.A-D—is sympathetic to this objection), I do not need to respond to it further here. For a discussion of the concerns that underlie this potential objection, see e.g. Hutchinson, Legal Ethics, supra note 8 at 26.
61. See e.g. Crystal, ibid. at 9.
because codes of conduct are often open textured in approach and indefinite in content, what any given individual considers to be “professional” can depend on personal moral deliberation as to what counts as “ethical.” As will be seen, it is therefore important to maintain the conceptual distinction between what is professional, under codes of conduct, and what is ethical, as ultimately guided by personal moral deliberation.

II. DOMINANT MODEL OF PROFESSIONALISM

One approach to Atkinson’s “fundamental question” is provided by the traditional and still dominant view of the lawyer’s role. Familiar labels such as “zealous advocate,” “amoral technician,” and “neutral partisan” are used to describe this hegemonic model of lawyering. In a nutshell, the basic defining elements of this narrative are that the lawyer’s job is to advance zealously the client’s cause with all legal means; to be personally neutral vis-à-vis the result of the client’s cause; and to leave the ultimate ethical, personal, economic, and social bases for the decision to proceed in the hands of the client. According to this view, lawyers should reject non-legal factors such as morality, popularity, religion, power, custom, etc. and be guided only by what the law allows, thereby viewing themselves purely as legal agents for their clients.

Perhaps the “spirit[] of the past” that is most often “conjure[d] up” in defence of this dominant model is that of Henry Brougham who, in defence of Queen Caroline against adultery charges brought by her husband King George IV, famously argued that a lawyer “knows but one person in all the world, and that person is his client.” However, lest we think that this is a vision and language of old, the same words continue to be used by modern legal ethics scholars. As David Layton has commented, the “dominant view is everywhere in Canadian law.” This dominant vision of the lawyer’s role is premised on well-established arguments sounding in principle, policy, and practice. The model is also well represented in visions of lawyers as portrayed in literature, popular culture, and the media.

62. See Part IV.C, below.
65. See e.g. Wasserstrom, “Lawyers as Professionals,” supra note 20 at 6.

A. PRINCIPLE

The animating principle behind the dominant position—consistent with enlightenment notions of individual autonomy and freedom—is one that champions a client’s freedom to arrange her affairs within the bounds of the law. According to Atkinson, “[s]ociety recognizes individual autonomy as a good in the highest order … and carves out a sphere in which individuals can exercise that autonomy without interference. By helping lay folk … the lawyer is accomplishing a moral and social, not just professional, good.” The lawyer’s job, therefore, is to facilitate “the client’s exercise of moral autonomy as

68. Lord Brougham further commented, regarding the advocate’s role, that “[t]o save that client by all means and expedients, and at all hazards and costs to other persons, and, among them, to himself, is his first and only duty; and in performing this duty he must not regard the alarm, the torments, the destruction which he may bring upon others.” J. Nightingale, ed., Trial of Queen Caroline, vol. 2 (London: J. Robins & Co., 1821) at 8 [Trial of Queen Caroline]. See also Farrow, “Ethics in Advocacy,” supra note 15.

69. See e.g. Dash, supra note 13 (“A lawyer knows but one person, his client” at 217). See generally Freedman, supra note 64 at 9.

72. Atkinson, “Perverted Professionalism,” supra note 41 at 187-88. As such, when proponents of neutral partisanship describe their model as amoral, they are not referring to its ultimate grounding, which is emphatically moral. They are referring, rather, to the lawyer’s immunity from the task of scrutinizing the morality of particular client acts. Theirs is the morality at the wholesale but not the retail level; a morality of the long run, not the particular case; a morality of fidelity to role obligations, not attention to particular acts.

(at 188) [footnotes omitted].
authorized by the law.”

Lawyers as champions of client freedom militate against a tyranny of the majority or of the executive (in line with de Tocqueville’s observations about lawyers), which is particularly important in the context of a legal profession that essentially has a monopoly over the provision of increasingly complicated and necessary legal services. Any other role for the lawyer would “usurp the role not just of judge and jury, but of the legislature as well.”

Justifications for the dominant narrative also come from the fact that, particularly—although not exclusively—in the criminal law context, clients deserve the best defence and representation possible, especially when they are up against the power of the state and individual liberty is involved. Further, according to Lon Fuller, the purpose of a rule of professional conduct that makes it proper to defend a criminal, including one whom the lawyer knows to be guilty, “is to preserve the integrity of society itself. It aims at keeping sound and wholesome the procedures by which society visits its condemnation on an erring member.”

The criminal law context therefore provides the strongest justification for the dominant model, even though a minority of lawyers

---

73. Ibid. at 187 [footnotes omitted].
77. See e.g. Wasserstrom, “Lawyers as Professionals,” supra note 20 at 7-8.
79. For this reason, the dominant model’s treatment of the criminal defence lawyer is also the most difficult aspect of the dominant model to critique. In fact, there is a debate in the alternative literature about whether the alternative models, discussed further in Part III, apply equally to criminal defence work as they do to civil side work. For example, Wasserstrom argues that “the amoral behaviour of the criminal defense lawyer is justifiable,” practises criminal law. Finally, the institutional setting of the adversary system requires that all participants—specifically including lawyers—“adhere to their institutional roles.” The dependability and predictability of the adversary system relies on the amorality of the participating advocates.

B. POLICY

These animating principles and justifications for the dominant narrative have been embodied in numerous sources of policy, most notably including various codes of professional conduct. Perhaps one of the strongest modern policy statements is found in the ABA’s Model Rules, which provide that when acting as an advocate, “a lawyer zealously asserts the client’s position under the rules of the adversary system.” Similarly in Canada, the CBA’s Code provides that and is of the view that “[o]nce we leave the peculiar situation of the criminal defense lawyer ... it is quite likely that the role-differentiated amorality of the lawyer is almost certainly excessive and at times inappropriate.” Wasserstrom, “Lawyers as Professionals,” supra note 20 at 12 [emphasis in original]. See similarly Rhode, Interests of Justice, supra note 66 at 72 (arguing that the criminal context often requires role differentiated behaviour); David Luban, Lawyers and Justice: An Ethical Study (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988) at 148 (arguing that, in the criminal defence context, “the appeal to the adversary system by-and-large vindicates the kind of partisan zeal characterized in the standard conception”) [Luban, Lawyers and Justice]. See further Atkinson, “Perverted Professionalism,” supra note 41 at 191. In contrast, William Simon rejects the distinction between civil and criminal contexts as a reason to move away from the notion of justice-seeking as the basis for ethical deliberation. See William Simon, The Practice of Justice: A Theory of Lawyers’ Ethics (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1998) at 170-94, discussed in Dolovich, supra note 76 at 1647-48.

80. See e.g. ABA Young Lawyers Division, Survey, “Career Satisfaction Among Young Lawyers” (2000) at 13 (table 11), online: ABA <http://www.abanet.org/yld/satisfaction_800.doc>.

when acting as an advocate, “the lawyer must … represent the client resolutely, honourably and within the limits of the law.”

In the spirit of the dominant model’s commitment to amorality, these policy provisions recognize the importance of the lawyer’s ability to raise arguments that, while legal, may not be popular (or moral). For example, the LSUC’s Rules provide that the lawyer “has a duty to the client to raise fearlessly every issue, advance every argument, and ask every question, however distasteful, that the lawyer thinks will help the client’s case, and endeavour to obtain for the client the benefit of every remedy and defence authorized by law.”

Further, in line with the principles of the dominant model, even if the lawyer has personal difficulties with the position of the client, the dominant model requires the lawyer to suppress his or her own views in favour of those of the client and to “refrain from expressing the lawyer’s personal opinions on the merits of a client’s case.” Alberta makes the same point even more bluntly: “What the lawyer believes about the merits of the case is essentially irrelevant.”

C. PRACTICE

Finally, not only do the principles of the dominant model play out in the guiding policy statements in the area, they also resonate with the routine practice of most lawyers’ daily work. One only needs briefly to visit the local civil or criminal courts to see the model in action. The model is equally present in the context of everyday solicitor work, including real estate deals, estate matters, corporate and securities work, tax planning, et cetera. In sum, the dominant model is not only the dominant model in theory, it also continues to be the dominant model in practice.

84. CBA, Code, supra note 27.
85. For example, according to Wasserstrom, the dominant model has been described as rendering lawyers “at best systematically amoral and at worst more than occasionally immoral in his or her dealings with the rest of mankind.” Wasserstrom, “Lawyers as Professionals,” supra note 20 at 1.
86. LSUC, Rules, supra note 10, r. 4.01(1), commentary [emphasis added].
87. Ibid.
88. The Law Society of Alberta, Code of Professional Conduct, c. 10, r. 11, commentary [LSA, Code].
89. See e.g. Mason, supra note 21.
90. Discussed in Wasserstrom, “Lawyers as Professionals,” supra note 20 at 8. In the specific context of representative negotiation, see e.g. Robert F. Cochran, Jr., “Legal Representation...
We also see the realities of legal practice playing themselves out in the ways that lawyers are portrayed in literature, film, popular culture, and the media. From before Shakespeare to after Shaw, lawyers continue to be viewed in literature primarily through the lens of amorality and by the choices and actions that result from that amoral viewpoint.\(^9\) For example, as Jean-Baptiste Clamence, the narrator and former successful Parisian lawyer in Camus' La Chute (The Fall) mused: “Now and then I still argued a case. At times even, forgetting that I no longer believed in what I was saying, I was a good advocate.”\(^9\) Representations of lawyers in movies and other popular culture venues continue with this tendency.\(^9\) For example, for fans of Law & Order, there is no doubt that Jack McCoy’s views that “justice is a by-product of winning” and that “sometimes you have to make deals with the devil” separate the attorney’s personal morals from the client’s causes.\(^9\) The media also regularly highlight the ethical challenges of lawyers\(^9\) as well as normalize or romanticize the role of \(^9\) See e.g. Kate Fillion, “‘One prominent lawyer told me, “Every lawyer is going to go into the office today and commit fraud.” Then he laughed.’ Ex-Bay Street lawyer Philip Slayton talks the zealous advocate. Either way, the dominant message is delivered and perpetuated both inside and outside of the profession.

---

E. HEGEMONY LIGHT

If the client’s interests were truly all that was at stake for an advocate, as the purest of zealous advocacy models proposes, his or her job would be relatively straightforward: there would only be, in line with Lord Brougham’s articulation, “one person in all the world.” Most versions of the dominant model, however, do not focus solely on the zealous representation of the client. First, lawyers—no matter how zealous—cannot engage in illegal activity by, for example, concealing evidence or obstructing justice. This view is consistent with typical code of conduct provisions requiring lawyers to act “within the limits of the law.”

Second, although slightly more controversial, most dominant trend theorists typically recognize and make space for a lawyer’s obligations to the court. For example, according to Florida State Judge David A. Demers of the Sixth Judicial Circuit for St. Petersburg, the “best definition” of professionalism balances “two primary duties: (1) zealous representation … and (2) service as an

96. See e.g. Mason, supra note 21 (discussing the role of Peter Ritchie and other members of the defence team in the Robert Pickton murder trial); Liptak, ibid.; and Wilbur, ibid. (stating that the “accepted view in the profession” is that “a lawyer should be a zealous advocate…”).

97. Trial of Queen Caroline, supra note 68.

98. Freedman, supra note 64 at 6; Fried, supra note 71 at 1080-82.

99. See e.g. CBA, Code, supra note 27.

100. See e.g. Freedman, supra note 64 at 9-24.
officer of the court.” What counts as service “to the court” is a contested discussion. One less controversial version of this service would be the relatively narrow and negative obligations not to, for example, “deceive a tribunal,” “misstate the contents of a document [or] the testimony of a witness,” or “dissuade a witness from giving evidence.” However, given that the privilege of self-regulation has come with the responsibility of acting in the public interest, acting as an officer of the court has been seen by some to include more expansive notions of lawyering responsibilities that potentially are required by the public interest. These more expansive notions are captured in code provisions that require lawyers to temper their zeal and act not only “within the limits of the law” but also “honourably” and by discharging “all responsibilities to … the public.”

However, but for understandings of what counts as acting “honourably” that include visions of the advocate as giving their “entire devotion to the interests of the client,” or as acting to further the dictates of client autonomy within the spirit of the adversary system, the dominant model of lawyering struggles to make sense of legislative dictates that put “duties” on professional bodies to

102. See e.g. LSUC, Rules, supra note 10, r. 4.01(2).
103. See generally Part III.B of this article.
104. See e.g. Rondel v. Worsley, [1967] 1 Q.B. 443, Lord Denning M.R. (C.A.), aff’d [1969] 1 A.C. 191 (H.L.). Similarly, the former Chief Justice of Ontario—when speaking on the topic of “advocacy in the 21st century”—emphasized the various competing interests to which advocates must be faithful: “Lawyers are not solely professional advocates or ‘hired guns’. And while they do not surrender their free speech rights upon admission to the bar, they are also officers of the court with fundamental obligations to uphold the integrity of the judicial process, both inside and outside the courtroom. It is the duty of counsel to be faithful both to their client and to the administration of justice.” Hon. R. Roy McMurtry, “Role of the Courts and Counsel in Justice” (The Advocates’ Society Spring Symposium 2000, Advocacy in the 21st Century, 6 June 2000), online: <http://www.ontariocourts.on.ca/coa/en/ps/speeches/role.htm>.
105. See e.g. CBA, Code, supra note 27. See also LSUC, Rules, supra note 10, r. 4.01(2)(b).
106. See e.g. LSUC, Rules, ibid., r. 1.03(1)(a).
107. Freedman, supra note 64 at 9.
108. See e.g. Pepper, supra note 71. See further Atkinson, “Perverted Professionalism,” supra note 41.
act in the “public interest,” “to maintain and advance the cause of justice and the rule of law,” and “to act so as to facilitate access to justice.” 109 To address these ethical challenges and duties, an alternative model has developed. 110 This alternative model is the second “school” contemplated by Atkinson in his discussion of the “fundamental question of professional ethics.” 111

III. ALTERNATIVE MODELS OF PROFESSIONALISM

The basic point of departure for critiques of the dominant model, as intimated by Atkinson’s question, is the opportunity for, or obligation on, lawyers to be guided by extra-legal norms, such as morality, religion, politics, and custom, when representing their clients. Further, critics of the dominant model have a much more expansive view of the kinds of interests that must be considered when determining the appropriate course of action in a given situation. As with the dominant model of professionalism, there are equally compelling arguments in support of these alternative models sounding in principle, policy, and practice. 112

A. PRINCIPLE

The starting point for this discussion really comes from the foundational premise that lawyers, as self-regulated professionals, have been given the opportunity and responsibility to act not just in the interests of their clients but, more fundamentally, in furtherance of the “public interest.” 113 Therefore,

109. See Law Society Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.8, s. 4.2.
112. Although there clearly are differences between alternative models, as a general matter they maintain more similarities than differences. For a useful discussion of some of the leading alternative models, their similarities and differences, see Dolovich, supra note 76 at 1646-49, 1664-65, in which she writes that “[i]n the main” a number of alternative models share “the view that ethical lawyering requires the exercise of discretion by individual lawyers, who must judge for themselves in any given situation what justice requires and act accordingly” (at 1648). For a useful discussion on the distinctions between the American and Canadian perspectives on legal ethics, see Woolley, “Integrity in Zealousness,” supra note 83.
113. For example, according to the Supreme Court of Canada,

[c]learly, a major objective of the [New Brunswick Law Society] Act is to create a self-regulating professional body with the authority to set and maintain professional standards of practice. This, in turn, requires that the Law Society perform its paramount role of protecting the interests of the
in addition to the interests of the client, the advocate must take into consideration a number of other interests (as required by his or her status as a member of the legal profession) including those of other clients, himself or herself, opposing lawyers, the court, and other sectors of society included in the overall administration of justice.114

A number of visions are contemplated by the various attempts to develop an alternative model, including descriptions of lawyers as “officers of justice” who are “morally reflective individuals”;115 descriptions of the lawyer’s role as a “moral activist[]”;116 requiring a “profession-wide emphasis on greater moral sensitivity and self-awareness among attorneys”;117 and descriptions of the lawyer’s professional duty as requiring “reflective judgment” to “further justice”118 and provide “moral perspective”119 through the development of “critical morality.”120 All of these descriptions taken together, in response to Atkinson’s question,121 essentially require lawyers “to accept personal

---

114. For a recent discussion of some of these competing interests and some of the challenges that come with seeking to balance them, see Farrow, “The Negotiator-As-Professional,” supra note 15. See also Atkinson, “Perverted Professionalism,” supra note 41; Wasserstrom, “Legal Education,” supra note 37; Rhode, “Persistent Questions,” supra note 3; and Beverley G. Smith, Professional Conduct for Lawyers and Judges, 3d ed. (Fredericton: Maritime Law Book, 2007) c. 1.

116. Luban, Lawyers and Justice, supra note 79 at 160.

117. Vischer, supra note 34 at 271.

119. Vischer, supra note 34 at 225.

responsibility for the moral consequences of their professional actions.”

In the “extreme” form, the lawyer should “avoid doing harm” by refusing to act if the lawyer thinks that the outcome of “winning” would be on balance a “bad thing” or “socially unfortunate,” in spite of the fact that “the client will pay” and that the lawyer “wouldn’t be doing anything that came close to violating the canons of professional ethics.”

As can be seen, when calculating what amounts to furthering the cause of justice or the public interest, these alternative accounts invariably rely on some sense of individual morality. They do not allow the lawyer morally to “insulator[e]” herself “within her role” from the justice or injustice of the client’s cause. These various accounts take seriously the lawyer’s personal morality or sense of justice in the spirit of balancing, and indeed privileging, the interests of the public over those of the client, particularly when those interests collide. Beyond that, however, these views do not mandate one sense of what counts as morality. What is encouraged is not a shared sense of morality that provides “bright-line answers,” but rather “ethically reflective analysis and commitments.”

Further, even if we thought that the dominant model provided a viable vision of the lawyer’s role, that vision can only, in its best light, amount to a fiction. Because lawyering is a human exercise, it will always be accomplished through the lens of the human experience. According to Mark Orkin, “A lawyer cannot, more than any other man, keep his personal conscience and his professional conscience in separate pockets … it cannot be seriously denied that every lawyer is, in some measure, the keeper of his client’s conscience.”

Robert Vischer has more recently developed this line of thought. He believes

122. Rhode, Interests of Justice, supra note 66 at 66-67. See also Hutchinson, Legal Ethics, supra note 8 at 50-58, 212; Allan C. Hutchinson, “Calgary and Everything After: A Postmodern Re-vision of Lawyering” (1995) 33 Alta. L. Rev. 768; and David Luban, “Integrity: Its Causes and Cures” (2003) 72 Fordham L. Rev. 279. Similarly, according to Atkinson’s description of the moral activist, the lawyer cannot be “neutral professionally toward what she opposes personally.” Ibid at 191.

125. Rhode, Interests of Justice, supra note 66 at 71. See infra notes 174 and 178 and accompanying text.

126. Mark M. Orkin, Legal Ethics: A Study of Professional Conduct (Toronto: Cartwright & Sons, 1957) at 264-65 [footnotes omitted].
that a lawyer’s own “moral convictions” are “inexorably part” of the “attorney-client dialogue,” whether “acknowledged by the attorney or not.” If lawyers fail to acknowledge the morality that “holds sway” over their professional deliberation, that morality is “forced into the background, where it is not susceptible to exploration by the client.” As such, the dominant model of lawyering is a fiction and is “not a harmless fiction, for it facilitates the tendency of clients to equate legality with permissibility.”

Finally, even if lawyers were able to compartmentalize their moral deliberation in the spirit of robust role-differentiated behaviour, by so doing, they impoverish the possibilities of giving legally and ethically sound advice to their clients and run the risk of paying a significant personal and social price. According to Wasserstrom, the “nature of professions … makes the role of professional a difficult one to shed … In important respects, one’s professional role becomes and is one’s dominant role … This is at a minimum a heavy price to pay for the professions as we know them in our culture, and especially so for lawyers.”

B. POLICY

As with the dominant model of lawyering, there are equally—if not more—powerful policy statements supporting the alternative approaches to professionalism, including numerous code-based and legislative statements. From the perspective of professional codes of conduct, a good starting point in Canada is the “President’s Message” that introduces the CBA’s Code, which provides that “[s]tandards of professional ethics form the backdrop for everything lawyers do.” Further, the “Preface” to the CBA’s Code provides that its “primary concern” is “the protection of the public interest.” Similarly, in Ontario, the Law Society Act provides that, “[i]n carrying out its functions, ... duties and powers under this Act,” the LSUC has a “duty” to “maintain and advance the cause of justice and the rule of law”; “facilitate access to justice”; and “protect the public interest…” 134

There are many different code statements that support this loose notion of acting in the “public interest.” For example, the CBA’s Code, in its provisions governing the lawyer’s relationship to the “administration of justice,” provides that “the lawyer should not hesitate to speak out against an injustice.” 135 In Ontario, the LSUC’s Rules dictate that, when acting as an advocate, “a lawyer shall not … knowingly assist or permit the client to do anything that the lawyer considers to be … dishonourable… .” 136 Similar international examples also obtain. For example, according to the New York Lawyer’s Code of Professional Responsibility of the New York State Bar Association (NYSBA), a lawyer “should be temperate and dignified, and refrain from all illegal and morally reprehensible conduct.” 137 As well, the Basic Rules on the Duties of Practicing Attorneys (Basic Rules) of the Japan Federation of Bar Associations (JFBA) provide that the “mission of an attorney is to protect fundamental human rights and realize social justice.” 138

Providing these justice-seeking policy statements, although important, is not the end of the matter. For the alternative models of professionalism, they form just the beginning of the conversation, since the codes fail to define what constitutes an “injustice,” “dishonourable” or “morally reprehensible” conduct, or even “social justice.” Often lawyers are left to their own moral devices to understand these provisions and their application to particular courses of action.

134. Law Society Act, supra note 109, s. 4.2. Similarly, in Alberta, the Preface to the LSA’s Code provides that the “legal profession is largely self-governing and is therefore impressed with special responsibilities. For example, its rules and regulations must be cast in the public interest, and its members have an obligation to seek observance of those rules on an individual and collective basis.” Supra note 88, Preface.

135. CBA, Code, supra note 27, c. XIII, commentary 3.

136. LSUC, Rules, supra note 10, r. 4.01(2)(b). See similarly ibid., r. 1.03(1)(a) (which is not limited to the lawyer’s role as advocate).

137. NYSBA, New York Lawyer’s Code of Professional Responsibility, Canon 1, EC 1-5, online: <http://www.nysba.org/Content/NavigationMenu/ForAttorneys/Professional Standards forAttorneys/LawyersCodeDec2807.pdf>.

(thus creating contested devices, understandings, and applications). For this reason, it is important to keep notions of ethics and professionalism distinct.

There is also therefore a need for what Rhode contemplates as a lawyer’s ability for “ethically reflective analysis.”

There are numerous policy-based statements recognizing the need for individual deliberation by lawyers. In Canada, for example, the Law Society of Alberta acknowledges that its professional “rules and regulations … cannot exhaustively cover all situations that may confront a lawyer, who may find it necessary to also consider legislation relating to lawyers, other legislation, or general moral principles in determining an appropriate course of action.” In Ontario, the LSUC regards the notion of a “competent lawyer” as someone “who has and applies relevant skills, attributes, and values…” Further, Ontario lawyers—“particularly in-house counsel”—acting for organizations in the post-Enron era “may guide organizations to act in ways that are legal, ethical, reputable, and consistent with the organization’s responsibilities to its constituents and to the public.” By separating what amounts to “legal” and “ethical,” clearly the LSUC contemplates professionalism as an advisory exercise that involves more than simply the consideration of client conduct that is “legal.” In the United States, the ABA acknowledges that its Model Rules “do not … exhaust the moral and ethical considerations that should inform a lawyer, for no worthwhile human activity can be completely defined by legal rules.” Similarly, in Japan, even when a lawyer “endeavor[s] to realize his or her client’s legitimate interest,” that lawyer “shall follow the dictates of his or her conscience.”

It is possible, although often a stretch, to harmonize the above code-based goals (of encouraging lawyers to speak out against an injustice and to avoid

139. See Part IV.C, below.
141. LSA, Code, supra note 88, Preface [emphasis added].
142. LSUC, Rules, supra note 10, r. 2.01(1) [emphasis added].
143. Ibid., r. 2.02(5.2), commentary [emphasis added].
144. See similarly ibid., t. 4.01(2)(b): “When acting as an advocate, a lawyer shall not … knowingly assist or permit the client to do anything that the lawyer considers to be dishonest or dishonourable…” For my discussion on a potential objection regarding the distinction between “legal” and “ethical,” see supra note 59.
146. JFBA, Basic Rules, supra note 138, t. 21 [emphasis added].
dishonourable or morally reprehensible conduct) with the underlying institutionally-based and autonomy-seeking policies of the dominant model of professionalism. However, even if we accept that level of harmonization, it is not credibly feasible to harmonize the tools provided by the codes for realizing those challenging goals—“general moral principles,” “relevant ... values,” “act[ing] in ways that are ... ethical,” “moral and ethical considerations,” the lawyer’s “conscience,” et cetera.\textsuperscript{147}—with the amoral “hired gun” principles underlying the traditional dominant model. Indeed, it is even difficult to harmonize these code-based tools with the policy-based tools used by the dominant model and found in the very same codes.

As I will discuss shortly, although difficult to reconcile with other seemingly conflicting code provisions that are traditionally relied upon by proponents of the dominant model,\textsuperscript{148} the code provisions, discussed above, open up alternative ways of lawyering that do make meaningful room for the relevance of a lawyer’s “moral principles” and “conscience,” all of which take seriously interests beyond those of the client. We now appear to have two viable visions of the lawyer actively grounded in two different but equally robust sets of code-based policy statements.

\textbf{C. PRACTICE}

Notwithstanding the earlier discussion of the dominant role of the zealous advocate in today’s practice, there is clear and convincing evidence that a lawyer’s personal morality actively influences how lawyers practise law. Further to Vischer’s argument that we cannot escape our own moral framework,\textsuperscript{149} moral choices are made by lawyers throughout the project of law. As David Tanovich has argued, “over the last fifteen years, we have been engaged in an ongoing process of role morality reconstruction. Under this reconstructed institutional role, an ethic of client-centred zealous advocacy has slowly begun to be replaced with a justice-seeking ethic that seeks to give effect to law’s ambition.”\textsuperscript{150} Starting from their first days in law school, students are making more informed choices about what law schools to attend, what courses to take, \textsuperscript{147} See supra notes 141-43 and 145-46.

\textsuperscript{148} See Part II.C, above, for various dominant model code provisions.
\textsuperscript{149} Vischer, supra note 34 at 228-29.
\textsuperscript{150} Tanovich, supra note 25 at 273.
and what areas of law to pursue. Lawyers are actively making decisions about which clients to take, how to represent those clients, and how to withdraw their services when a client relationship breaks down (in terms of trust, respect, et cetera).

All of these practical trends accord with my own anecdotally-based assessments of lawyers and law students over the past eighteen years of studying, practising, and teaching law. They also accord, as David Tanovich argues, with the conclusions of an empirical study of Ontario lawyers by Margaret Ann Wilkinson, Christa Walker, and Peter Mercer. This study—although far from concluding that lawyers had moved from the dominant to an alternative sensibility of lawyering—“amply demonstrates that … lawyers are preoccupied with the constant tensions of specific solicitor-client relationships and the lawyer’s overall obligations to society.”

D. COMPETING PROFESSIONALISMS

At the moment, then, students of professionalism are currently left with two broad and competing menu choices when thinking about how best to understand legal ethics, or put differently, how best to approach Atkinson’s “fundamental question of professional ethics.” On the one hand—speaking from principle, policy, and practice—there is still robust life in the spirits of the dominant model. On the other hand, a self-conscious moral sensibility of lawyering is certainly not a stranger to the modern vision of professionalism. In fact, on each of these three indicators, there is powerful and persuasive support for those who believe that they are not guided only by law’s limits in the exercise of their lawyering duties.

151. In these circumstances, decisions to withdraw need not be based simply on legal or financial conflicts, but can also be based on conflicts of a personal nature. See e.g. LSUC, Rules, supra note 10, r. 2.04. See also relevant competence principles, r. 2.01. For a general discussion of the alternative model playing itself out in practice, see ibid.

153. Wilkinson et al., ibid. at 190, cited in Tanovich, ibid. at n. 15 and accompanying text.

In my view, the principles and policies that support the alternative model fit more naturally with the modern realities of lawyering. They tend to support Tanovich’s observations regarding the shift toward a “justice-seeking ethic” over the past fifteen years. Moreover, they fit more naturally with an early version of the CBA’s guiding ethics principles on a lawyer’s duty: “to promote the interests of the State, serve the cause of justice, maintain the authority and dignity of the Courts, be faithful to his clients, candid and courteous in his intercourse with his fellows and true to himself.” This vision nicely fits with the aspirations of my students when asked if they would prefer a vision of professionalism that allowed for the opportunity to maintain a meaningful sense and space for “self.”

However, even if Tanovich is correct in that the “zealous advocacy” model is slowly being replaced by a “justice-seeking ethic,” we are clearly a long way from shedding the “names, battle slogans, and costumes” of the dominant ideology. According to David Luban, one of the most vocal supporters of an alternative vision of lawyering, although those who subscribe to an alternative vision of professionalism represent “a substantial minority of the legal profession, it is a minority view nonetheless.” So why do we continue to be so powerfully influenced by the dominant trend of professionalism?

Several possible answers obtain. First, there is the argument of tradition. There is no doubt that the dominant model enjoys the weight and sway of a long history and tradition. One only needs to look as far as the earlier discussion of Lord Brougham’s vision of a lawyer  to find support for this tradition-based argument. However, as is typically the case with tradition- (or precedent-) based arguments, without some other compelling reason, these arguments tend to be nothing more than self-serving tautologies; the model is

155. Tanovich, supra note 25 at 273.
156. CBA, Canons of Legal Ethics (Ottawa: CBA, 1920) cited in Orkin, supra note 126 at 13 [emphasis added]. For a current articulation of these Canons, see e.g. Law Society of British Columbia, Professional Conduct Handbook, c. 1 (in force 1 January 1992).
157. Supra note 9 and accompanying text.
158. See Marx, “Eighteenth Brumaire,” supra note 1 at 595.
160. Supra note 68 and accompanying text.
161. Compare Tanovich, supra note 25 at 272, n. 19 and accompanying text.
persuasive, because the model has been persuasive for a long time. Without something more, this line of argument fails to account for the model’s continued dominance, particularly in the face of viable alternative options.

Second, perhaps the dominant model continues its hegemonic prominence because it is simply more compelling. Given its autonomy-seeking focus and its one-size-fits-all foundation (one of its “dangerously attractive” features\textsuperscript{162}), there is no need for uncomfortable ethical deliberation on the part of individual lawyers. The dominant model champions its amoral ability to be applied to all lawyers and all lawyering situations. It thereby criticizes the alternative models for overplaying the relevance or supremacy of the lawyer’s individual moral choices or preferences (that risk usurping the ethical autonomy of the lawyer’s client) while underplaying the institutional value of the lawyer in the adversary system. However, the problem with these arguments and justifications for the dominant model’s continued prominence is that, as was demonstrated above,\textsuperscript{163} there is compelling principle, policy, and practice-based evidence that in my view fatally challenges its assumptions and foundations.

A third and related basis for the model’s continued hegemony stems from the power politics and economics of the lawyering process. Law has increasingly become a competitive business driven by complex needs of powerful clients. As Gavin MacKenzie comments, “Lawyers practise in a market economy, and the highest bidders in such an economy are wealthy and often powerful.”\textsuperscript{164} Having lawyers who will zealously do their bidding obviously serves the interests of clients. It also, however, often serves the interests of lawyers. Personally (and politically) it allows lawyers to sidestep the messy business of moralizing and taking personal responsibility for the deeds of their clients. Economically, it allows lawyers to charge significant fees in exchange for adopting a morally role-differentiated professional position.

There is no doubt that this power-politics basis provides a significant justification for the persistence of the dominant model that views the lawyer-client relationship as symbiotic. However, in addition to the principle, policy, and practice examples that challenge the basis of these power politics,\textsuperscript{166} there is \textsuperscript{162.} Farrow, “The Negotiator-as-Professional,” \textit{supra} note 15 at 398.

\textsuperscript{163.} See Part II, above.
\textsuperscript{164.} MacKenzie, \textit{supra} note 63 at 1-7. See also Iacobucci, \textit{supra} note 36 at 860.
\textsuperscript{165.} Discussed further in Part II A-B, above.
\textsuperscript{166.} See Part III, above.
also no direct evidence supporting the basis of this argument, which is—at its root—that lawyers are exclusively willing pawns of their clients, or as MacKenzie describes, willing to “fiddle on the corners where clients throw coins.” In my view, seeing lawyers in such a weak light cheapens not only the office of the lawyer but also the reality of the practice. Further, as MacKenzie comments, “[t]here is no evidence that lawyers who act for the wealthy and powerful are any more or less ethical than are those who act for the poor and powerless.” Similarly, as Hutchinson remarks, “[l]aw may well be a business, but that does not necessarily entail an unethical or unprofessional approach to conducting that business.” These comments certainly accord with my own experience in the practice of law, in which complex and financially costly client demand often went hand-in-hand with a high degree of self-reflective ethical conduct. They also accord with increasing demands (often by wealthy, powerful clients) for ethical practices from legal counsel. So while certainly a significant answer, I do not think that power politics provides the ultimate answer for the dominant model’s continued persistence.

The fourth and most persuasive reason for the continued prominence of the dominant model comes not from the strength of that model but rather from a weakness in the way that the alternative models have, to date, been presented. Specifically, the alternative models are often framed in terms of the “moral perspective,” “moral lawyering,” or “the good lawyer.” Even though proponents of these models sometimes see things differently, these labels tend to connote some shared or required understanding of what counts as “moral” or “good.” It has taken the Enlightenment three hundred years to move this understanding from the realm of the family and the personal to a collective understanding of autonomy and rights at the public level of civil society. It is

168. See Part III.C, above.
171. For a brief discussion of my former practice experience, see e.g. supra note 40.
172. See McClintock, supra note 14 and accompanying text.
173. See supra notes 34-37 and accompanying text.
174. See e.g. Rhode, Interests of Justice, supra note 66 at 71.
an understanding that cannot, by most accounts of liberalism in a pluralistic and complex society, be defended.\textsuperscript{175} To avoid this apparent trap, the dominant vision of the lawyer—“aiming not to inject her own vision of the good into the representation, but simply to pursue the client’s vision of the good through the maximization of the client’s legal rights”\textsuperscript{176} (based on classic Rawlsian political liberalism that prefers the right over the good\textsuperscript{177})—nicely sidesteps a search for shared values and visions of the good life through role-morality. As such, it fosters the Enlightenment project of individual freedom and autonomy.

Even if we are persuaded by, for example, Rhode’s answer to the problem of shared morality,\textsuperscript{178} these “intolerant”\textsuperscript{179} labels, by their very nature, tend to characterize the “other” side as being the opposite of a “good” lawyer, a “moral” lawyer, or a “just” lawyer, which the “other” dominant view rejects. For example, when looking for a shared conception of the public interest, Tanovich argues that it must at least require “lawyers to act in the pursuit of justice.”\textsuperscript{180} In turn, justice for Tanovich “can be defined, for purposes of the lawyering process, as the correct resolution of legal disputes or problems in a fair, responsible, and non-discriminatory manner.”\textsuperscript{181} This definition of justice-seeking lawyering, or any of these alternative “moral” or “good”-based labels for that matter, are not wrong. In fact, by and large they are right. The problem is that these definitions and labels could be (and are) equally and credibly claimed by both sides to describe their lawyering projects. Lawyers on both sides think of themselves as “morally \textsuperscript{176} Vischer, \textit{supra} note 34 at 227.

\textsuperscript{177} \textit{Supra} note 175.

\textsuperscript{178} See Rhode, \textit{Interests of Justice, supra} note 66 at 71.

\textsuperscript{179} See Atkinson, “A Dissenter’s Commentary,” \textit{supra} note 25 at 343.

\textsuperscript{180} Tanovich, \textit{supra} note 25 at 284.

\textsuperscript{181} \textit{Ibid.} [citation omitted] [emphasis in original].
They just approach these labels from very different perspectives.

And so we return to Atkinson with two competing and intractable stories. One story, by “anxiously conjur[ing] … up the spirits of the past,” continues to create “a world after its own image.” The other story, a modern story that challenges this old world image, rejects much of its “names, battle slogans, and costumes.” In so doing, however, it has failed—at the moment of “revolutionizing” itself and of “creating something entirely new”—to replace the “time-honoured disguise and … borrowed language.” What is needed is a new, persuasive lens through which to see the world not in the service of “all the dead generations,” but in the service of the “living” in “this society” and in the service of “the world of our children.” What is needed is a story of professionalism that captures the energy and positive attributes of both sides of this debate. What is needed is a story of professionalism that is sustainable.

IV. SUSTAINABLE PROFESSIONALISM

A key aspect of the problem is that the two stories, on their face, disagree about how to evaluate what counts as the “right” course of action in a given circumstance. Their positions on this fundamental question compete. If we continue to assert these competing positions without uncovering the interests that underlie their positions—unless we find some common ground or more 182. Rhode, Interests of Justice, supra note 66 at 67.

183. Dolovich, supra note 76 at 1649.
184. Ibid.
185. Ibid.
186. Ibid.
187. Ibid.
188. Ibid.
189. Ibid.
190. Ibid.
191. Ibid.
192. Ibid.
193. See Mayer, supra note 2.
194. Ibid.
specifically, a persuasive lens through which to see this potential common ground—we will maintain this gridlock. By uncovering the underlying interests at stake in each of the two versions, we will start to see who and what we need to address and to protect in order to develop a story of professionalism that addresses all (or at least as many as possible) of those underlying interests. We will find common ground on which to build a theory of professionalism that is (as far as possible) acceptable to, or sustainable for, both sides.

A. UNDERLYING INTERESTS

So what are those underlying interests? For the dominant model, the client maintains the ultimate interest. More specifically, this model preferences the client’s ability to maximize his or her autonomy and rights within the broad parameters of what counts as legal, and free from the moralizing of the advising lawyer. For the alternative visions, some version of “justice” or the “public interest” is the primary interest at stake. Again, this model specifically cares about the interests of a number of stakeholders—the client, the lawyer, the judge, the other side, and the public (present and future)—who, taken together, describe the interests of justice or what is thought of as the public interest. Under this model, discovering and balancing these interests actively engages the lawyer’s own moral opinions and preferences in the dialogue.

The primary points of disagreement between these approaches are the number of relevant stakeholders (client versus client and others) and the relevance of a lawyer’s own moral opinions (vis-à-vis the client’s chosen course of legal conduct). Otherwise, both sides seem to agree on the basic justice-seeking premise of the lawyering exercise. We can recast this discussion, taking account of both the shared and competing interests, through a lens of sustainability.

Before developing a concept of sustainability, I should note that my vision of professionalism does not treat one side or the other as morally superior or inferior. This exercise does not need to be an antagonistic zero-sum game. Rather, we must recast our discussion in terms of being able to address, 196. This process of uncovering “interests,” in the face of competing “positions,” is an application of interest-based negotiation theory. For a discussion of this theory, see Colleen M. Hanycz, “Introduction to the Negotiation Process Model” in Hanycz, Farrow & Zemans, supra note 15, c. 3.

protect, and accommodate as many of the underlying interests of the two competing visions as possible.

B. SUSTAINABILITY

My approach re-directs much of the positive energy and progressive ideas of the competing models of professionalism through a more persuasive, sustainable lens. This approach stems from my frustration from hearing students and lawyers say to me countless times that a new way of thinking about professionalism would be a good idea in theory, but is just not sustainable in reality.\(^1\) This article therefore answers those skeptics by proposing a form of professionalism that is normatively sound, is descriptively accurate, and provides the basis for broad-based buy-in from as many justice-seeking stakeholders as possible. At the moment, neither the dominant nor the alternative model satisfies all three requirements.

Interestingly, but for a handful of references to several useful but general social science initiatives looking at the role and future of professionalism,\(^2\) there is little meaningful discussion of “sustainability” in the academic literature on legal ethics.\(^3\) It is not a mantra that theories of professionalism have self-consciously embraced.\(^4\)

As a general matter, sustainability has come to be primarily identified with three particular approaches: “sustainability as optimal living resource exploitation”; “sustainability as respect for ecological limits”; and “sustainability as sustainable development.”\(^5\) While all three approaches characterize the typical use of the concept in modern legal parlance, they do not preclude other, more general uses of the idea. Nor do they preclude a wide range of

---

\(^1\) See e.g. supra notes 40 and 43 and accompanying text.

\(^3\) I realize that proving a negative is not an easy task. For purposes of this article, it is also not a necessary task.

\(^4\) However, as is discussed in Part IV.B.4, below, several theories of professionalism do provide some useful groundwork for this approach.

stakeholders from engaging in discussions of sustainability broadly defined. For example, according to Stepan Wood,

[s]ustainability has emerged as one of the defining preoccupations of human affairs at the opening of the twenty-first century. It has proven to be simultaneously as alluring and as challenging to international lawyers as it has to scientists, politicians, businesspeople and others. It provides a powerful symbol around which diverse interests can converge, but at the same time it eludes concrete definition, encompasses conflicting agendas and promises to generate continuing debate and controversy.202

To my mind, the legal profession provides a new terrain for “continuing debate” about the utility of sustainability, broadly defined. There are many definitions of the word “sustain”: for example, to “uphold the validity or rightfulness of” or to “keep (a person or community … etc.) from failing or giving way.”203 Further, “sustainable” was defined (in the context of development) in the foundational “Brundtland Report” as meeting "the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs."204 For my purpose, a lens of sustainability provides a “powerful symbol around which diverse interests can converge,”205 “encompasses conflicting agendas,”206 “promises to generate continuing debate and controversy,”207 and is open to some normative notion of “rightfulness”208 in the eyes of a “person or community.”209 Also important is the consideration of both current and future interests.210

202. Ibid. at 2.
205. Wood, supra note 201 at 2.
206. Ibid.
207. Ibid.
208. OED, supra note 203.
209. Ibid.
210. “Brundtland Report,” supra note 204. For a useful judicial treatment of the term “sustainability,” including the importance of non-economic “social values,” see Tsilhqot’in
From before, we saw that the primary conflicting agendas involved those solely of the client as compared to those of a broader range of voices. Further, the theories of professionalism disagree as to the relevance or prominence of a lawyer’s individual moral opinions vis-à-vis a client’s legal course of action. Therefore, a useful lens of sustainability must take into account a broad range of these competing interests, which I have organized into four main groups: client interests, lawyer interests, ethical and professional interests (of lawyers and the profession), and the public interest. It is important to note that the following discussion purports to be neither comprehensive regarding an individual interest nor complete regarding the totality of interests. Rather, what follows is a brief treatment of a sampling of some fundamental, perhaps competing, interests.

1. CLIENT INTERESTS

The dominant model of professionalism described above protects and fosters meaningful space for the interests of clients, particularly powerful and wealthy clients, typically to the exclusion of all others. As we saw, based on principle, policy, and practice-based arguments, any notion of professionalism must make robust space for the realization of a client’s legal interests in a free and democratic society.

211. See Part IV.A, above.
212. Ibid.
213. I am adapting this framework from earlier comments I made on the topic of professionalism (particularly in the context of professionalism from a negotiator’s perspective). See Farrow, “The Negotiator-as-Professional,” supra note 15 at 376-77.
214. Because I am developing a general theory of sustainable professionalism in this article, what follows is a sampling of interests that could apply in a range of practice contexts (e.g., corporate, family, real estate, and criminal). It would also be useful—and should be an issue for further research—to look at this theory of sustainability within the context of specific practice areas. One area of particular interest (given its prevalence) and potential challenge, would be the corporate law context, in which clients often wield significant wealth, power and influence vis-à-vis the interests of their lawyers. See MacKenzie, supra note 63 at 1-8 (and accompanying text). As MacKenzie notes, in this world of increased commercialism within the practice of law, the “pressure to condone unethical or even unlawful but lucrative acts can be overwhelming.” I am grateful to Allan Hutchinson for comments regarding this line of inquiry.
215. See Part II, above.
At the outset, nothing in a theory of sustainability seeks to reject the importance of a client’s legal interests. In fact, as Hutchinson—a primary proponent of an alternative approach to professionalism—argues, a “directive to lawyers to take responsibility for what they do (and do not do) ought not to be viewed as an excuse to ignore the needs of clients…” Further, “lawyers will not foist their own values on the client, nor will they work with clients in ways that offend their own moral convictions. Initiated and sustained in this way, the lawyer-client relationship will be mutually respectful and engaged.” Clients must play a central role in any calculus of a sustained theory of professionalism. This makes sense as a descriptive matter. It also makes sense as a freedom-seeking normative matter. Important, however, is the realization that the conversation does not end here. If we are to make sense of the further principle, policy, and practice-based arguments that so powerfully animate the alternative models of professionalism, we need to take seriously and make room for some of the other (sometimes competing) interests that are at stake in this discussion.

2. LAWYER INTERESTS

As a starting point, there are numerous demands of the lawyering role that engage several self-interested notions of professionalism. First, there are pecuniary interests. Lawyers want to get paid and paid fairly for the hard work that they do and for the services that they provide. Therefore, a sustainable notion of professionalism must take into account the ability of lawyers to make a fair living. As the Honourable Frank Iacobucci comments, to the “extent that lawyers … are financially successful it is often because they effectively and efficiently serve the needs of their clients, and that is an admirable thing.”

Further, non-pecuniary interests of the lawyer will also play a prominent role in a sustainable notion of professionalism. Lawyers should expect to maintain a meaningful ability to pursue activities and interests that make for a

217. Ibid. at 214 [emphasis added].
218. A robust theory of client representation must also recognize the variety and diversity of clients and client interests. For a useful treatment of this issue, see e.g. Hutchinson, “Who Are ‘Clients’?”, supra note 170.
219. See Part III, above.
220. Iacobucci, supra note 36 at 863.
full life not only as lawyers but also as members of society. Time at work, time at home, time with friends, and time engaging in social and political affairs should all be realizable goals of a sustainable professionalism. A sustainable notion of professionalism must avoid “slavishly adhering to billable hours and client getting at the cost of overlooking the quality of the work offered by lawyers or their contributions to the profession and the community both in legal and non-legal spheres.”

There already exists a rich and growing body of literature that deals with professional issues such as professionalism and work-life balance. A sustainable discourse of professionalism must seriously grapple with those demands and that literature. As argued above, doing so does not amount to ignoring the interests of clients. It also does not guarantee or mandate a certain lifestyle or work ethic. This discourse calls for the balancing of client interests with other interests, including—as contemplated by various canons of professional conduct—that of the lawyer. By so doing, it creates more meaningful space for the interests of the lawyer that the dominant model, by constantly foregrounding the interests of the client, invariably backgrounds. Under a sustainable model, lawyers have more choice in the calculus of how to proceed in a given context.

3. ETHICAL AND PROFESSIONAL INTERESTS (OF LAWYERS AND THE PROFESSION)

Numerous ethical and professional interests are at play when mapping out a sustainable vision of professionalism. The principles and policies that animate the alternative models provide numerous robust bases for requiring that ethical and professional considerations be a meaningful part of a sustainable vision of professionalism.

In addition to seeing the lawyer’s role as one that should pursue “social justice” by avoiding “dishonourable” or “morally reprehensible conduct,”

221. Ibid.
222. See e.g. Farrow, “A Profession, Not a Life,” supra note 5.
223. See Part II, above.
224. See e.g. supra note 156 and accompanying text.
225. I recognize that some of these issues are equally of interest to the public, and could therefore be categorized in the fourth—“public interest”—subheading in this part.
226. See Part III.A-B, above.
227. See supra notes 135-38 and accompanying text.
several other ethical or professional interests must form part of a sustainable discourse of professionalism. As a starting point, for this discourse to include the many different faces that make up the bar today, we must first recognize and celebrate the diversity of that bar. We must reject stories of lawyers who, collectively, are members of a homogenized and unified profession. Why? First, as a descriptive matter, such stories are not reflective of reality. As numerous commentators have noticed, those who practice law make up an increasingly diverse social, political, economic, cultural, and gender-based background. Second, as an economic matter, lawyers need increasingly to make sense of diversity obligations because clients are demanding that they do so. Market-based diversity incentives, in the form of diversity checklist programs, are a further reason why diversity matters in the context of understanding modern notions of professionalism.

Third, as a normative matter, such stories act to exclude a wide range of people who are or want to be practising law in diverse and meaningful ways in society. As Constance Backhouse has articulated, traditional stories of the practice of law have often resorted to ideas of “professionalism” that “exercise power and exclusion based on gender, race, class and religion.”

---

229. See e.g. McClintock, supra note 14.

Honourable Bertha Wilson, in her seminal report, Touchstones for Change, to the CBA on equality and diversity, forcefully articulated the premise that a "starting point for a discussion on the need for change must be the recognition that gender equality is a fundamental legal norm... . The law in Canada now demands adherence to the equality principle. The legal profession should show leadership by adopting equality norms as its own." 231 Clearly for a theory of professionalism to be sustainable for the diverse communities that practise law, it must speak in terms that honour that diversity, not in terms that marginalize it. As former Governor General Adrienne Clarkson argues:

[The profession] should be more of a mirror of society—and the society we’ve become—if it is to have a truer perception of the public interest and a more self-conscious awareness of its role and responsibility in the creation of our new citizenry. And this starts with greater equity and equality in the legal profession itself. 232

A greater understanding and openness to diversity in our notions of professionalism will provide a more welcome and meaningful home for more lawyers. It will also push the profession’s understanding of and participation in a public interest that truly reflects the reality of our general pluralistic and globalized civil societies. 233 Further, however, it will also recognize the diversity of individual lawyers, with diverse moral perspectives, which will in turn assist with the charge that by allowing lawyers to moralize about their clients’ causes, we will require some sense of a shared morality. 234 Andrew Kaufman states,

I do not think it all bad that the kind of advice clients get depends to some extent on the chance of whom they choose or have chosen for them as lawyers… . In some cases there are costs to leaving things to chance. But so are there costs in trying to force very different lawyers with very different sensibilities into one attitudinal mold for nearly all situations. 235

Celebrating a multiplicity of voices at the bar also assists with the “last lawyer in town” objection, which is often raised by dominant model theorists as a potentially fatal concern with alternative models of professionalism. As the argument goes, if all lawyers moralize about the causes of their clients, there is a good chance that clients with unpopular causes will not be able to find lawyers to take their cases. 236 The question then becomes even more difficult if you—as a moral lawyer—find yourself to be the last lawyer in town. Do you take the case? My first response to this question is: “show me evidence establishing this concern as a recurring problem and I will then start to worry about it.” 237 Along the lines of “hard cases make bad law,” it just has not been our typical experience that unpopular causes have systematically gone unrepresented. Second, if that unlikely scenario were to materialize, a balancing of competing interests—those of the client, the lawyer, and the state to provide for an adversarial system that is open to all comers—might well lead on balance, under a sustainable theory of

234. See e.g. Rhode, Interests of Justice, supra note 66 at 71.
236. For commentary raising this type of concern, see e.g. Dash, supra note 13 at 220 (“If a lawyer says my moral judgments don’t allow me to support this particular person, even though I know he has a legal case, who will represent that person?”). See also Rhode, supra note 66 at 57; Ibid.
237. I am anecdotally aware that such cases do exist, particularly in more rural contexts.
professionalism,\textsuperscript{238} to the lawyer taking the case. Third, even taking this concern at face value as a real concern (which some people do\textsuperscript{239}), celebrating a pluralism of voices at the bar goes a long way to mitigating this risk. With a multitude of moral backgrounds and perspectives, a diverse bar becomes more welcoming to clients with diverse legal needs.

Other professional issues of interest to a theory of sustainable professionalism relate to some of the realities and responsibilities of practising lawyers, often seen in the context of litigation.\textsuperscript{240} One issue in particular that strongly militates against a robust view of adversarialism as the basis for a persuasive model of professionalism is that, as Tanovich has recognized, at least in the context of the civil dispute resolution system, almost all cases settle.\textsuperscript{241} The dominant model typically takes as its paradigmatic lawyer the zealous advocate, most often as conceptualized in the litigation context. However, “the ‘overwhelming preponderance’ of what lawyers do ‘involves negotiating with others,’”\textsuperscript{242} which is invariably located outside of the courtroom. As such, a professionalism that is sustainable in the eyes of all lawyers, not just of those who act in the 2 per cent or so of cases that go to trial, must take into account the varied practice contexts of all non-courtroom lawyering experiences.\textsuperscript{243}

4. PUBLIC INTEREST

Flowing from the third group is this fourth group of interests that, taken together, focus specifically on the public interest. Again, there is a vast array of \textsuperscript{238} Developed further, below, in Part IV.C.

\textsuperscript{239} See e.g. Kaufman, supra note 235.

\textsuperscript{240} In addition to the issue of adversarialism, discussed in this section, another practice-related issue of interest to a sustainable understanding of professionalism is the issue of civility. See e.g. Michael Code, “Counsel’s Duty of Civility: An Essential Component of Fair Trials and an Effective Justice System” (2007) 11 Can. Crim. L. Rev. 97. But see Alice Woolley, “Does Civility Matter?” (2008) 46 Osgoode Hall L.J. 175.

\textsuperscript{241} See Tanovich, supra note 25 at 282 [citation omitted]. For an earlier discussion of mine on settlement rates, see e.g. Trevor C.W. Farrow, “Dispute Resolution, Access to Justice and Legal Education” (2005) 42 Alta. L. Rev. 741 at 749, n. 43.

\textsuperscript{242} Farrow, “The Negotiator-as-Professional,” supra note 15 at 373 [footnote omitted].

\textsuperscript{243} For a recent discussion of the varied roles of modern lawyers, specifically including their role as settlement counsel, see Julie Macfarlane, The New Lawyer: How Settlement is Transforming the Practice of Law (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2008). For a review of the Macfarlane book, see Andrew Pirie, (2008) 46 Osgoode Hall L.J. 203.
interests that could be captured as part of this discussion. A notion of sustainable professionalism must maintain meaningful room for protection of the public interest, and in particular the robust and aspirational principle- and policy-based statements that animate the alternative models of professionalism in the spirit of protecting the public interest. A notion of professionalism that does not acknowledge that “[s]tandards of professional ethics form the backdrop for everything lawyers do,” and further, that a “primary concern” of the profession is “the protection of the public interest,” will not be sustainable on any calculus that makes good on the bargain with society to protect the public interest in return for the privilege of self-regulation.

As a starting point, the alternative model commentator who comes closest to articulating a self-conscious theory of sustainable professionalism—primarily in the spirit of the typical notions of sustainability that focus on living resources, ecology and development—is David Luban. In his discussion of the “social responsibility of lawyers,” Luban argues that lawyers have a responsibility in the project of “solving collective action problems.” He contemplates the notion of a “socially responsible” lawyer as a professional who “forbear[s] from collectively harmful action.” Further, he defines this notion of “collective responsibility” as “the responsibility we bear not to foul our own nest, to maintain the very systems that sustain us.” Echoing the green movement, Luban asks, “[w]hen will we reach the point of understanding that to evade our social responsibilities is little more than suicide?”

Far from deferring to client interests that, while legal, may not be sustainable from the long-term perspective of the environment, Luban contemplates the lawyer’s role as one of an active moral agent who takes

---

244. See Parts III.A-B, above.
245. Tabor, “President’s Message,” supra note 132.
246. CBA, Code, supra note 27 at ix.
247. Discussed in supra note 103 and accompanying text.
248. Wood, supra note 201 at 1-4.
250. Ibid.
251. Ibid. at 963.
252. Ibid. at 982.
253. Ibid. at 983.
seriously the responsibility to do good in the world. Luban’s perspective is a self-consciously moral perspective. Of course what amounts to doing “good” in a given case may still be a contested discussion. And that is acceptable because having a discussion, rather than simply deferring to a client’s interests, is a significant part of the exercise of a theory of sustainable professionalism. By allowing for this discussion, Luban’s morally reflective approach enables multiple interests to be considered and balanced. It is also a perspective that takes seriously professional code dictates not only to avoid “injustice” and “dishonourable” or “morally reprehensible” conduct, but also to pursue courses of conduct that foster “social justice.”

Luban is not alone on this issue. Other commentators also advocate a theory of professionalism that makes meaningful space for lawyers pursuing just causes with their legal skills. Duncan Kennedy, for example, makes no apologies for his view that lawyers “should avoid doing harm” with their “lawyer skills.” Hutchinson, although leaving significant space for client autonomy in his alternative vision of professionalism, takes seriously the centrality of the lawyer’s role by encouraging a sensibility of “critical morality” that asks: “What interests am I going to spend my life serving as a lawyer?” Each of these accounts fits with Mayer’s ultimate challenge to the bar, namely, that lawyers should demand that their efforts on behalf of their clients also amount to “a plus for … society and for the world of our children.” A sustainable notion of professionalism—one that makes good on the promise of public interest protection—therefore needs to take seriously these alternative accounts. And in case this all seems far from what should reasonably be expected of the practising bar, we should remember that calls to “maintain and advance the cause of justice and the rule of law” and to “protect the public interest” come not only from these aspirational interpretations of professional principles, but also from foundational legislative dictates that establish our very professional existence. They also, at least according to Tanovich, are already being realized.

254. See supra notes 135-38 and accompanying text.
257. Mayer, supra note 2.
258. See Law Society Act, supra note 109, s. 4.2.
259. See Tanovich, supra note 25.
In addition to thinking about the substance of what our clients do under the rules of the legal system, there is a threshold discussion of whether or not clients can access the system in the first place. Protecting the public interest requires a theory of professionalism that contemplates a bar that is working toward meaningful access to the system for all members of society. For example, as Ontario’s Law Society Act provides, the LSUC has a “duty” to “facilitate access to justice.”

The dominant model of professionalism, by focusing on the courtroom battlefield of the zealous advocate, proceeds on the assumption that clients have access to that battlefield in the first place. We know, however, that such ready access is not a reality for most people. Access to justice in this country (in the form of access to lawyers and access to the system), and indeed around the world, is only a fiction. As such, a sustainable professionalism must not proceed on an assumption of full access. Rather, we must start at the problematic level of today’s access realities and develop a theory of professionalism that seeks to be creative and successful vis-à-vis the bar’s obligation to “facilitate access to justice.”

C. BALANCE AND CONTEXT

So where does this leave us? From a review of the competing principle, policy, and practice-based arguments that animate the dominant and alternative models of professionalism, and trying to make sense of these various complex, contextual, and sometimes competing interests—reminiscent of some of the interests set out at the beginning of this article—what remains is a challenge

260. See Law Society Act, supra note 109, s. 4.2.
263. Law Society Act, supra note 109, s. 4.2. For a useful account of the bar’s responsibilities to foster access to justice (which has influenced my thinking on the connections between access to justice and professionalism), see Richard Devlin, “Breach of Contract?: The New Economy, Access to Justice and the Ethical Responsibilities of the Legal Profession” (2002) 25 Dal. L.J. 335. See also Hutchinson, Legal Ethics, supra note 8 at 85-88.
264. See Parts II and III, above.
265. See supra notes 3-14, 32, and accompanying text.
that neither the dominant nor the alternative model has fully overcome. As I argued earlier, both sides must learn to think and speak in terms that are sustainable to a wide range of voices and interests. The dominant model, through its narrow focus primarily on one interest “in all the world,” misses a variety of other relevant people and interests. The alternative model, on the other hand—through its typical focus on the “good lawyer”—has been seen to be unrealistic in practice, at least in light of the continued use of “time-honoured disguise[s] and … borrowed language.”

This theory of sustainable professionalism addresses the gridlock created by these competing notions of professionalism. It purports to do so by harnessing both the energy and optimism of the alternative models as well as the tenacity of the dominant model. Even more importantly, it self-consciously identifies the myriad interests that are at stake in the context—those of the client, lawyer, profession, and public—and draws them into a theory of professionalism that is sustainable.

By moving beyond the centrality of the client’s interest as championed by the dominant model, instantly we open ourselves up to competing and potentially irreconcilable interests. This theory of sustainable professionalism takes seriously the complex and pluralistic landscapes of lawyers, clients, and the public. But in order to have a chance of buy-in from those broad-based stakeholders, we need to live in the world of those complexities, not in a world of fictional simplicity. As Backhouse reminds us, doing otherwise simply perpetuates exclusion. Such exclusion, in turn, fails to develop a professionalism that is sustainable on any calculus. We also need to live in a world that is not afraid of those complexities. At times conflict will be unavoidable. And when it does occur, a sustainable theory of professionalism will seek to balance and respect as many interests as possible. For example, allowing for client autonomy and meaningful space for moral deliberation by a lawyer is not necessarily a mutually exclusive exercise. In fact, as Hutchinson argues, it is an exercise that can in fact be mutually beneficial: “To provide sound professional judgment, it is necessary to resort to a well-honed and

266. See Part III.D, above.
267. Trial of Queen Caroline, supra note 68.
268. See Marx, “Eighteenth Brumaire,” supra note 1 at 595.
269. Backhouse, supra note 230.
mature sense of moral acuity.”270 Further, failing to develop “bridges” between the “professional role” and the “dictates of a personal morality” will “impoverish both professional and personal pursuits.”271

At times, however, the conflict will be irreconcilable. The legal demands of a client retainer may collide head-on with the dictates of a lawyer’s own personal moral code. For example, what if a rich, speculative, private land developer wishes to negotiate a deal with a slum landlord over the purchase of a fully functioning, low-income rental facility that currently houses eighty subsistence-income-level families, in favour of its demolition and replacement with a high-end, multi-use condo facility that would house eight high-income families?272 Would you take the retainer? How would you advise the developer? Would it make a difference if you knew that alternative housing arrangements, given the current rental market, were not immediately available to those other families? Alternatively, what if the CEO of a large privately-held downsizing transnational security firm came to you and asked you to negotiate a deal in private that would result in the termination of all employees of the Muslim faith, based on your client’s unfounded occupational requirement theory that these employees, while good people, simply pose too much of a reputational and security risk (in terms of attacks against security officers in the field) and are therefore too costly to the firm?273 What course of action would avoid an “injustice,” would avoid “dishonourable” or “morally reprehensible” conduct, and would promote a generally accepted notion of “social justice”?274

The dominant model and alternative models have not been able to find common ground on these sorts of questions. The dominant model provides

271. Ibid.
272. See Farrow, “The Negotiator-as-Professional,” supra note 15 at 388, n. 62. This hypothetical case, and my use of it in previous commentary and in class discussions, has been directly influenced by Duncan Kennedy’s initial development of a similar scenario. See Kennedy, “The Responsibility of Lawyers,” supra note 123 at 1161.
274. See supra notes 135-38 and accompanying text.
that if the lawyer decides to accept the retainer (which is itself, although not required, an act that is encouraged by the dominant model), he or she must background his or her own moral views and proceed to effect the client’s legally permitted instructions. Based on anecdotal experience, that is not a personally satisfying, acceptable, and therefore sustainable approach for many students and lawyers.275

The alternative models, by typically asking the question “what does justice require?” in a given situation, immediately open the door to contextual analysis.276 By so doing, competing interests can be balanced and, in the end, be prioritized on a calculus of what a lawyer thinks is a “good” course of conduct. This is what Rhode contemplates as a lawyer’s ability of “ethically reflective analysis.”277 As they currently stand, however, the alternative models—by perceiving themselves as taking the moral (justice-seeking) high ground and by casting the lawyering exercise into a normative hierarchy—have alienated both members of the dominant model and closet members of the alternative models who fail to see room for a theory of professionalism that makes space for the institutional practicalities and realities of the practice of law.

By seeking to normalize these competing interests and discourses, through an exercise of interest identification and rationalization, the theory of sustainable professionalism recasts these interests into a broad collective of inputs. These inputs are the landscape of what amounts to the “real world” of the modern lawyering project. Seeing competing interests in this light normalizes them. It also forces any theory of professionalism to take them into account in order to be sustainable in the eyes of its various interested stakeholders.

If a lawyer chooses to represent the “rich, speculative, private land developer,”278 then—pursuant to a theory of sustainable professionalism—he or she is doing so because, based on an interest-based calculus that includes a broad range of voices (including the client, the lawyer, and the public), the lawyer thinks it is a “good” thing to do, not because of the feeling that he or she “has to do it.” The lawyer may choose to do so because he or she agrees with the 276. See e.g. Rhode, Interests of Justice, supra note 66 at 67; Tanovich, supra note 25 at 302.

277. Rhode, Interests of Justice, ibid. at 71.
278. See supra note 272 and accompanying text.
client’s motivations. Alternatively, the lawyer may be persuaded by the principle of client autonomy that underlies the dominant model of professionalism.\textsuperscript{279} In the further alternative, the lawyer may choose to take on the client but then try hard to persuade the client to pursue a different course of action. The lawyer’s motivations may be that he or she disagrees with the goals of the retainer and seeks to change the client’s mind. The lawyer may simply think that it is not the kind of work that he or she wants to do. Or the lawyer may think that it is not in the public interest, or that it is not “[]honourable,” “moral[,]” or in the pursuit of “social justice.”\textsuperscript{280} Regardless, the goal is to foster deliberation both for the lawyer and between the client and the lawyer, in the spirit of enabling a sustained and engaged discussion that takes seriously a variety of potentially competing interests. This is not simply an exercise in client autonomy or an exercise in moral superiority. It is an exercise in real world, sustainable lawyering.

Some may challenge this vision as simply restating the basic premise of the alternative models. There clearly are many similarities, and from the outset I have acknowledged my debt to these alternative models.\textsuperscript{281} My point is not to reject the alternative models but rather to draw on their energy and optimism. However, as I have also argued, there has been a consistent lack of buy-in to these models. This model of sustainable professionalism takes seriously the merits of those alternative approaches. At the same time it adequately responds to, often resists, but in some cases benefits from, the power of the dominant model. In the end, by accessing and being accessible to multiple norms, models, and interests, this model of sustainable professionalism does a better job of being “normatively sound,” being “descriptively accurate,” and providing the premise “for broad-based buy-in from as many justice-seeking stakeholders as possible.”\textsuperscript{282}

D. LEGAL EDUCATION

Before concluding, there is a further element of this discussion, and that is its connection to legal education. There are many moments within the profession \textsuperscript{279} See supra notes 71-76 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{280} See supra notes 135-38 and accompanying text. See further supra notes 252 and 272 and accompanying text.
\textsuperscript{281} See e.g. supra notes 46, 154-56 and accompanying text. See also Part IV.B, above.
\textsuperscript{282} From Part IV.B, above. See supra note 197 and accompanying text.
at which the possibility of change can occur, including at law schools, bar admission programs, mentoring initiatives, continuing education courses, judicial speeches and judgments, discipline rulings, bencher directives, and in professional rules and commentaries. Of course external sources for change also obtain, including legislative limits on self-regulation, public opinion, client demands, and others. However, it is at the initial stage of the professional experience that a sensibility of openness to alternative discourses is most palpable, possible, and important.

How we see ourselves individually as lawyers and how we see ourselves collectively as a profession are foundational questions that must be addressed in legal education. We need to realize and make use of the fact that law schools retain significant power "to structure the moral perspectives of those who experience it." As Richard Wasserstrom argues, the question of "what is the nature of the good lawyer?" is potentially "one of the central questions, if not the central question, of legal education." Similarly, according to Deborah Rhode, "[l]aw schools cannot be value-neutral on questions of value. One of their most crucial functions is to force a focus on the way that legal structures function, or fail to function, for the have-nots. Another is to equip and inspire students to contribute to the public good and to reflect more deeply on what that means in professional contexts."

As discussed earlier and elsewhere, there continues to be an alarming disconnect between what students think is right in the world and what students think they are going to be required to do to be "good" lawyers. This is particularly problematic, for no other reason than that it assumes, at the outset, that the role-differentiated amoral advocate championed by the dominant model is the only viable model in the context of the "real world" of lawyering. If after a full exposure to and consideration of alternative models a student prefers the dominant model of lawyering as one that should animate his or her own practice vision, then so be it. However, at the moment, those alternative models apparently do not stand a chance. All of the aspirational language that animates the principle, policy, and practice-based arguments of the alternative models—i.e. statutory and code-based requirements designed to promote “the cause of justice and the rule of law”288—are missing from the ultimate calculus of what counts as a “good” lawyer. And here we see how the dominant model perpetuates itself, notwithstanding the desires of many students and lawyers—and even some clients289—to engage in a deliberative exercise of “creating something entirely new.”290 A modern theory of professionalism must make room for these competing principle, policy, and practice-based arguments in a way that is accessible to the broad range of relevant stakeholders, so as to dethrone the dominant vision of professionalism in favour of a professionalism that is more sustainable.

283. Dolovich, supra note 76 at 1670.
286. See e.g. supra notes 40, 42, and accompanying text.
287. See e.g. Farrow, “Negotiator-as-Professional,” supra note 15 at 388, n. 62 and accompanying text; Kennedy, supra note 6 at 87 (discussed further at supra note 43 and accompanying text).

V. CONCLUSION

As Adam Dodek comments, with some notable exceptions, scholarship generally addressing legal ethics and professionalism in Canada is still in its early days.291 Further, Tanovich comments: “[u]nfortunately, we have only had few attempts in Canada to set out systematically a … theory of ethical lawyering.”292 This article seeks to add to those attempts.

From the start I have been troubled by the fact that, notwithstanding these powerful arguments of the alternative models there continues to be a remaking of history in the image of the past that favours the time-honoured but increasingly fictional vision of the dominant model of lawyering. It is a descriptively inaccurate model. It is a morally problematic model. It is an exclusionary model. It does not sit well with many current and future members of the bar. On that basis I have argued that it is not a sustainable model. Further, this resigned pose of un-sustainability is particularly pernicious in the

288. See Law Society Act, supra note 109, s. 4.2.
289. See e.g. McClintock, supra note 14 and accompanying text.
290. See Marx, “Eighteenth Brumaire,” supra note 1 at 595.
292. See Tanovich, supra note 25 at 309 [citation omitted].
context of law school. In its place, I have argued for a model of professionalism—seen through a lens of sustainability—that makes descriptive and normative sense of our complex modern legal world. I also hope, by so doing, to participate actively in the changing dynamic of law schools with a view to providing sustainable alternatives to the dominant stories of old. We need to recast our understandings of professionalism by way of a new lawyering sensibility, which is not of moral superiority (although that may, in the end, be the case), but of individual and collective sustainability. By moving away from a client-centered discussion and toward a discussion that takes seriously a plurality of voices and preferences, including but not exclusively those of the client, we will find many more takers for this theory of sustainable professionalism as a viable discourse for the practice of law. Given what is at stake, we cannot be agnostic to this exercise. Matasar argues:

Lawyers ... must ... be the driving force behind ethical and moral change. It is not enough to bump along, oblivious of the questionable tactics the profession engages in under the name of advocacy, zealous representation, or the lawyerly posturing. Doing so diminishes us as individuals and collectively gives the profession a bad name. No, our strategies must be different. We must be disobedient when it matters most; we must be reformers, constantly seeking a more moral profession; and we must be willing to withdraw.293

Staying the course of the dominant model will not allow us to fully realize our potential to be “the driving force behind ethical and moral change.”294 We need a sustainable alternative model to facilitate change. As Socrates commented in the Republic, the question of how we should live our lives—or in this context how we should view ourselves as professionals—is “no light matter.”295 This is because, as Mayer argues, in all likelihood “this society ... and the world of our children”296 will largely depend on how we view ourselves as professionals.

293. Matasar, supra note 23 at 986.
294. Ibid.
296. See Mayer, supra note 2.